A successful online attack could cause significant financial, operational and reputational harm to firms, as well as potentially threatening the stability of the financial system. Whilst banks have developed some of the most sophisticated risk mitigation capabilities, the threats are evolving rapidly and often have international dimensions. A genuinely global level strategic approach is needed to overcome these challenges.

Cyber threats to the financial industry are not only external, but also internal. Among reported cybercrimes, those committed by malicious insiders in financial services are amongst the most significant threats to networked systems and data. Financial institutions face the ongoing challenge of securing legacy systems that are linked together in a suboptimal way. Online banking has become commonplace, whilst new digital currencies are regularly appearing (but little understood). In the post-Snowden / post-Sony world, cyber security has never been more crucial

This conference will place the BFSI industry at the forefront of a comprehensive, global approach to meeting head on the challenges in managing the cyber risk.
